THE PRINCE OF WALES ATTAINS HIS MAJORITY.

On Wednesday last his Royal Highness he Prince of Wales attained his majority. l'hough still an infant .in consideration of iaw, he is now old enough in case of de-mise of the Crown to govern without a Regency. Considering the prejudice which is not unnaturally entertained by most persons conservant with English history against the government of a Regent, the courrence of an event which renders the probability of such a change still more remote than it happily is already may fairly be treated as a matter of congratulation without any disparagement to the abilities and virtues of the Consort of the Queen.—

Other importance the event has none, and we may all join with the utmost sincerity in the wish that it may be very long before the Prince of Wales is called upon to exercise these duties which he on Wednesday last became legally competent to discharge. But, though of no great political imporlance, the completion of the period at which the eldest son of Queen Victoria is compe-nheritance fortune destines for him. We do not now speak of augmented wealth or successful industry, or of the position which, in spite of her detractors, England still claims and maintains among nations of the earth. We allude to the gratifying fact that monarchy, which a hundred years ago seemed likely to become one of the most unpopular of English institutions, has since that period recovered more than all thel ground it has lost, and is, we verily believe, at this moment quite as popular whose character was altogether calculated to conciliate to him the feelings of his subjects. Charles II. degraded the crown, James II. made it hateful, William III. was too disagreeable to receive the popularity he meilted, and Queen Anne was a nonentity. The first two Princes of the house of Brunswick were, to say the least, singular-ly unprepossessing, and the third, with many homely virtues calculated to gain the affection of the English nation, was combine the private virtues which the English people above all nations in the world regard and appreciate, and the strict adherence to Constitutional maxims, which is the highest merit of an English Sovereign with manners and a way of life entirely congenial to the national tastes and habits.

Nor is it only to the eminent personal qual-

The town is overrunning with soldiers lying for a fight-bristling with bayonets filled with martial strains-and overflowing with patriotic love for the Old Dominion and old rye whisky, the two most plentiful things here. Patrols are couring the country for a radius of twenty niles, absolutely ravenous for an insurrectionist or a rescuer to show his face. They would make short work of him.

I write on a pew seat, for want of a better table, and very hurriedly. There is little chance as yet for learning anything definite. I will give you what I have been able to pick up hastily.

The execution will take place in a field half a mile in the rear of the jail. The scaffold is about completed, and is a common two post and platform affair. It is surrounded by an amphitheatre of rising ground, which will enable thousands to riew the execution, though they may be anable to hear what transpires. diers, about two thousand strong, will form a hollow square, within the lines of which it will be death for any "ontsider" to attempt to pass. ernor. He, wide awake to every thing, determined Monday night to see whether any of the sentinels "slept on their posts." He loitered along the camp lines awhile, and finally approached a sentinel. "Who comes there?" sang out the guard. "A friend," said the Governor. "Advance and give the countersign"-but the Governor had forgotten that, and came to a dead halt. It was an unpleasant dilemma so the Governor fell back on his dignity "I am Henry A. Wise, Governor of Vir-ginia," said the Governor. "Possibly you are," replied the sentinel, "but you are my prisoner," and murched him off to the guard house, silencing all objections by the menaces of a particularly sharp bayonet. Arrived there a superior officer was sent for, and the Governor released. He'll be the rest of this campaign.
